> Mysterious Velled Women Visit Mc Gonigal in Court.

There was considerable talk among the crowd of people who poured into the Court of General Sessions, Part III., this morning about an attempt that would be made by the lawyers who are defending the alleged murderers of Annie Goodwin to block the wheels of justice by protesting against further action in the present inquest so long as the jury impanelled the Western Railway yesterday retain their seats.

It was whispered that the grounds on every other favorable which they would object were that, in the first place, two juries had been impanelled to sit at the inquest, and that slightest effect on the this was illegal.

In the second place they claim that the law distinctly says that "the jury holding an inquest must view the body of the was weak in the early deceased" before rendering a verdict, and that therefore the proceedings taken thus far were null and void unless a second exhumation of the body is made, so that the jury may view it.

The horrible red blotches on the face of the woman Fannie Shaw, into whose of the woman Fanme Snaw, into whose loathsome hands the kind, "A No. 1" doctor confided the dying Annie Goodwin, were of a deeper color this morning, and she shook like a wisp of willow in a gale. Undertaker Cornelius Merritt, who

that had been flying about the court regarding the alleged illegality of the proceedings by stating to an Evenno Wonld

The witness, Joseph E. McCready, whose non-appearance yesterday caused an adjournment of the proceedings, was also in court. He was caught at his home, 161 East One Hundred and Fifteenth street, last night by Jacob A. Lehmann, an attache of the Coroner's office. Many of the speciators lingered about to get a better glimpse of the prisoners, who seemed to be very attractive to the morbidly curious.

Outside the doors of the building they also stood in the pouring rain, waiting to see the prisoners brought out.

A feature of the proceedings this morning was the entrance of two veiled women just before Coroner Messemer entered. They were well dressed, and they went hastily up to Dr. McGonigal and whispered to him. He listened, and shook his head reasuringly, and then the two fair visitors fied as quickly as they had come.

Later it was whispered about that the women were two of Dr. McGonigal's patients, who occupy high social positions. Rumor had it that the fear that their names would in some manner be connected with the case through the incursion of the detectives into the doctor's house recently had tortured them so that they decided to risk all and learn from McGonigal's line whether there was any possibility of their names being learned by the police through the letters the latter had read. ter had read.

The letters were not taken possession

The letters were not taken possession of by the police, as was at first supposed. They were left in Dr. McGonigal's house, but the police have a list of the names.

Monday's proceedings may be of a sensational character. It is expected that the prosecution will try and prove that McGready, the youth who took money from Harrison to Annie Goodwin, has also been a messenger to Dr. McGonigal in a like fiduciary capacity.

The detectives deny that they have any knowledge of such evidence, but the significant smiles which wreath their faces when spoken to on the subject do not bear out their denials.

A close watch will be kept on young McCready until Monday, for it is feared that the prisoner's friends will attempt to get him out of the way. Such evidence from him would put Harrison deep in the hole with Merritt.

Deputy Cosoners Jenkins and Conway will unfold a tale to the spectators concerning the cruel and inhuman way in which Annie Goodwin's body was jammed into the pine box by Undertaker Merritt.

They will also scientifically explain the manner in which it is alleged Dr. McGonigal's cruel knile was used, and the cause of her death will be plainly and fluently told.

Every Republican member was present and for half an hour Mr. Blaine addressed them on the subject of reciprocity.

Among the questions asked of the Secretary was whether Spain would be included in the resiprocity scheme, Mr. Blains having confined his remarks merely to relations with the Spainsh-American liepublics.

To this Mr. Blains is said to have replied that Spain was in too bad financial straits to surrender any of her revenues.
